From a late ENGLISH PAPER.
THE LOTTERY TICKET.

A MORAL TALE.

BY a train of disappointments, as unmerited as they were unforeseen, Mr. Clinton, an eminent Merchant, found himself reduced from an affluent situation to very moderate circumstances. He was married, and he had one child, a daughter. Mrs. Clinton had a good understanding, and a good heart; and as she and her husband were neither young, nor madly attached to the pleasures of the world, they left the metropolis to spend the remainder of their days in retirement, without murmuring at the dispensations of Providence. Not a little cheered, indeed, were they in their retreat by the consciousness of having done nothing to deserve the considerable change in their affairs. Retrospection, it is true, sometimes drew sighs from Mrs. Clinton's gentle bosom; but the philosophic consolations of him who had from his wedding day made her happiness the principal object of his attention, brightened her features with the smiles of contentment as often as they were clouded.

The place which they fixed upon for their retreat was a spot extremely pleasant, within a few miles of London; their house was privately, but most agreeably situated; they had charming landscapes around them whenever they threw up their windows; and the few friends, out of the herd of acquaintance who crowded their rooms in B---- Square, declared, whenever they came to see them, that their little villa was delightful.

Mrs. Clinton, having a passion for plants and flowers, found great amusement in the garden, which, with the education of a very tractable daughter, and the superintendence of her small family affairs, sufficiently excluded any complaints against the tediousness of time.

Fanny Clinton, when she was removed from London, was about twelve years of age; exceedingly pleasing in her person, sensible, and good natured. She merited all the indulgence with which she was treated by her affectionate parents; but certainly they were too fond of her—too fond of her for their own felicity; for while they loved her to excess, their fears, their anxieties about her, were beyond expression.

Mr. Clinton's house was in a populous village; but it stood at a distance from the gay and fashionable part of it. Far from being displeased, however, with the privacy of his situation, it was on that very account, the more agreeable to him; for he wanted not to keep a great deal of company, as he lived not in the style to which he had been accustomed: with a few sober, regular people, like themselves, he and Mrs. Clinton chiefly associated in a neighbourly way, without any ceremony or ostentation, and were determined to have no connections with the quality of D----. They might have been visited by half the place, had they given cards. They were much respected, indeed, by those who had, and those who had not roots; by the former they could not be loved, but they were satisfied with the respect and esteem of the latter.

After having lived very happily at D---- for five years, the addresses of a young Gentleman to their Fanny gave them a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. Hadley was a man of an unexceptionable character, but he had not a large fortune: yet, as he was desperately enamoured with Fanny, and gently offered to marry her without a shilling down, both Mr. and Mrs. Clinton thought him an object not to be disregarded. They would not, however, have consented to a marriage between him and their daughter, had not she been as much prejudiced in his favour, as he, evidently, was in hers: they had too sincere an affection for her to desire to have her separated from them with a man to whom she was averse; but as she really felt a strong prepossession for Mr. Hadley, they rationally believed that they would be mutually happy in the marriage-state.

While the necessary preparations were making for the wedding day, a ticket Mr. Clinton had in the lottery came up a ten thousand pound prize.

This event had such an effect upon Mrs. Clinton, that it absolutely transformed her into a new woman. She was suddenly seized with a violent desire to return to her old neighbourhood in London, that those who had with a malicious compassion triumphed over her on being obliged to retire, might be mortified by the sight of her in a situation equal to the showy one in which she once figured among them.

Mr. Clinton, having a stronger understanding, was not so elated with his success as to wish to launch out into his former style of living; on the contrary, he took no small pains to drive out of Mrs. Clinton's mind the magnificent ideas which had intruded themselves into it. But how little do we know ourselves!

By the death of a distant relation a few weeks afterwards, Mr. Clinton, very unexpectedly, as they had not been for many years upon good terms, came into the possession of a fortune more than double his prize.

This acquisition coming so quick after the other, spoilt him entirely for a philosopher; and he began to feel the flame which he had so strenuously endeavoured to extinguish in the bosom of his ambitious wife, burning in his own breast: the rage for appearance, though each of them was on the wrong side of forty, animated them both to such a degree, that they from that moment thought of nothing but pomp, parade, equipage, and state. When a passion for gaiety and splendor predominates in the hearts of those who are hastening to the autumnal part of their lives, it generally drives them into ridiculous situations; in which situations they certainly deserve all the merriment they excite.

The village of D---- was no longer to be endured. Enquiries were made immediately after a handsome house in the square from which they had prudentially removed; and luckily for them, as they thought, intoxicated with the flattering revolution in their affairs, a house was just at that time evacuated by the lady whose husband a few months before died in it. Mr. Clinton as soon as he heard of it, hurried to the Landlord, and closed an agreement with him as precipitately as if the felicity of his future life depended upon his second residence in B---- square.

While the preparations for their departure from D---- were going forward with the utmost expedition, Mr. Hadley returned from an excursion which he had made into H----shire, in order to settle every thing for the reception of his bride; and imagined he should give Mr. and Mrs. Clinton no small satisfaction by informing them that he was quite ready to wait on their daughter to church. Of Fanny's satisfaction he was pretty well assured,

To his extreme surprize he was received by Mr. Clinton with coldness: and when he acquainted him with the arrangements he had made in his house in H----shire, in consequence of having obtained his consent to marry Miss Clinton, he received the following reply:—"I have altered my mind, Sir, since you were here last with regard to the disposal of Fanny."

"Altered your mind, Sir! said Hadley with some warmth: "What are your reasons for this unexpected behaviour?"

"I am not obliged to give my reasons to any body, Sir."

Hadley not being able to procure any answers from Mr. Clinton more satisfactory than that above mentioned, left him in the parlour by himself, and went in search of Mrs. Clinton.

He found her in the garden watering her flowers; and could not help complaining to her, looking upon her entirely in his interest, of the reception which he had met with from her husband.

"Mr. Clinton, Sir, knows what he is about; and if you are dissatisfied with his behaviour, you will be equally so with mine, for we think, unanimously, I assure you, upon this occasion."

He then desired to see Miss Clinton.

"She is not at home, Sir; and if you will take my advice, you will never come hither again; for Mr. Clinton and I cannot now think of having you allied to us."

Hadley, though he had a small fortune, had a great deal of pride; he, therefore, did not attempt to make another visit to Mr. Clinton: but as he loved Fanny too sincerely not to wish to learn her sentiments, with regard to him, he wrote a very respectful and affectionate letter to her; and was rendered extremely happy by her answer, in which she positively declared that she would give her hand to no man breathing but himself.

When Mr. and Mrs. Clinton were settled in their new-house, those who had broke off all connections with them, came pouring in to pay their congratulating visits; their vanity was flattered by receiving those visits; and their pride gratified by not returning them. By this behaviour they threw the greatest part of the square into a violent commotion; but they were exceedingly easy about it: they were, indeed, sufficiently rejoiced at having an opportunity to mortify those families whose insolent behaviour they had with a proper spirit repented.

With their new neighbours, people who came to live in the square, after their retreat from it, they kept up a very regular visiting; but they were esteemed by nobody with whom they associated. They were envied for the splendor of their appearance; and they were hated for the haughtiness with which it was accompanied. They went to all public places; and in all public places were laughed at: their dresses were rich, their carriages were elegant, and their entertainments were superb; but their extravagance was excessive; so that while they were running from one end of the town to the other, in order to make an ostentatious display of their riches, they were literally, running to ruin. When a man and his wife are both seized with a furious propensity to make a flash in the world, when their youthful days are over, and with that propensity have likewise a "lofty disregard" for economy, they are certainly not in their "perfect senses;" they are downright lunatics, and deserve strait waistcoats as much as the insane inhabitants of Chelsea and Moorfields.

Mr. Clinton soon after his return to B---- square, found that his daughter had many admirers among men of the first fashion in town. To a man of quality, therefore, he determined, if possible, to marry her—Mrs. Clinton was equally desirous of having her daughter ennobled. An old debauched lord made his addresses to her, married her, and in a short time afterwards gave her a blow upon her breast, in a fit of jealousy, which brought on a cancer; and that cancer in less than a twelve-month, during which her sufferings in body and mind are not to be described, brought her to her grave.

Not long after the decease of their daughter, which made very little impression upon them, while they were carried along the stream of high life, with an irresistible rapidity, they started, as from a frightful dream; when they were informed by their steward that a single thousand only remained out of the five and thirty with which they came from their retirement at D----.

With the interest arising from that solitary thousand, after having sold off all their superfluities to pay their debts, they retired a second time. They merely existed during the remainder of their days: they were completely miserable, now conscious of having merited their misfortunes, perpetually upbraiding and reproaching each other in the severest terms.

Artful Revenge of an American Tribe on a French Trader.

THE Missouris, a people of Louisiana, were strangers to the Europeans, till about fifty years ago, a traveller, or hunter, coming into their country, acquainted them with fire-arms, and fold them muskets, powder and shot, by means of which their next hunt was very successful; and of course, furnished them with a great quantity of skins. Some time after, another adventurer went thither with ammunition; but the savages, part of their stock being yet remaining, were not very eager to deal with him, so that to retrieve this disappointment, he bethought himself of a pretty odd stratagem. The savages, being naturally curious, asked him in what manner gunpowder, which they call grain, grew in France; and he made them believe that it was sown in the Savannes, or fields, and reaped, at certain times, like indigo and millet. The Missouris, overjoyed at this information, which seemed pregnant with such vast benefits, fell to sowing all their powder, and readily purchased that of the French trader, by which he got an immense profit in beaver and other skins. The Missouris, went from time to time to see what appearance their powder made; and had placed a guard that no beasts might come and spoil this valuable crop; but they soon saw into the dealer's knavery. Be it observed, that the savages are to be cheated but once, and that they never forget the first fraud. Accordingly they determined to make themselves amends on the first Frenchman who should come among them. A little while after, the allotment of gain prompted the powder-monger to send a factor thither, with such goods as he knew would go off well amongst the Missouris. They, by some means or other, came to understand that this Frenchman was sent by the man who had imposed on them; but instead of taking notice of that transaction, received him very courteously, and even lent him their common hut, as a warehouse. No sooner were his goods spread abroad, and notice given of the sale, than the Missouris rushed in, and all who had been so credulous as to follow their powder, carried off a portion. The Frenchman inveighed against such a procedure, with all the gestures of rage, and even made his complaint to the chief of the nation, who, with a solemn accent, answered, that satisfaction should be made; but that nothing could be done till the harvest of the powder; and that on the word of a sovereign, he would then order a general hunt, and every skin of beaver, deer, or other beast, should be delivered to him, as the first fruits of the important secret, for which they were indebted to his ingenious countryman.

On PEACE and RETIREMENT.

HAIL ye soft seats! ye limped springs and floods!
Ye flowery meads, ye vales, and mazy woods!
Ye limpid streams, that ever murmuring flow!
Ye verdant meads, where flowers eternal grow!
Ye shady vales, where zephyrs ever play!
Ye woods, where little warblers tune their lay!
Here grant me, Heaven, to end my peaceful days,
And steal myself from life by slow decays;
With age unknown to pain or sorrow blest'd,
To the dark grave retiring as to rest;
While gently, with one sigh, this mortal frame,
Dissolving, turns to ashes whence it came;
While my freed soul departs without a groan,
And joyful wings her flight to worlds unknown,
Ye gloomy grots, ye awful solemn cells,
Where holy, thoughtful, contemplation dwells,
Guard me from splendid cares and tiresome state,
That pompous misery of being great;
Content with ease, ambitious to despise
Illustrious vanity, and glorious vice!
Come, thou chaste maid, here ever let me stray,
While the calm hours steal unperceiv'd away;
Here court the Muses, while the sun on high
Flames in the vault of heaven, and fires the sky;
Or while the night's dark wings this globe surround,
And the pale moon begins her solemn round;
Bid my free soul to starry orbs repair,
Those radiant worlds which float in ambient air,
And with a regular confusion stray,
Oblique, direct, along the arial way;
Or when aurora, from her golden bowers,
Exhales the fragrance of the balmy flowers,
Reclin'd in silence on a mossy bed,
Fallen realms and empires in description view,
Live o'er past times, and ancient days renew.
Thus lonely, thoughtful may I run the race
Of transient life, in no unuseful ease!
And thou, fair peace, from the wild floods of war,
Come dove like, and thy blooming olive bear;
Tell me, ye victors, what strange charms ye find
In conquest, that destruction of mankind!
Unenvy'd may your laurels ever grow,
That never flourish but in human woe;
If never earth the wreath triumphal bears
Till drench'd in heroes blood, or orphans tears.

L O N D O N, MAY 12.

LAST Wednesday an humble Address, Remonstrance, and Petition, of the free Burgesses of the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, was presented to his Majesty at St. James's, by Sir Francis Blake Delaval, Knight of the Bath. The following is a copy thereof:

To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty.

The humble ADDRESS, REMONSTRANCE, and PETITION, of the free Burgesses of the town and county of NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

WE, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the free Burgesses of the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, emulous of following the example of the city of London, notwithstanding the independency of its first magistrate, and of the two public-spirited sheriffs, has given such particular offence to your ministers, that ourselves called upon to repeat our unwearied application to your Majesty for redress of unexampled grievances.

We cannot but feel with the much-injured county of Middlesex for the wound given to them, to us, and to the constitution, and warmly animated by the late noble behaviour of the independent electors of Westminster, whose actions have best contradicted the fallacious language of your ministers, when they confidently assured your Majesty, that only some few misguided persons have complained of their determination—by the house of commons, but who nevertheless found themselves under a necessity of beholding, with silent confusion, a virtuous remonstrant rewarded by the grateful tribute of a free people.

We point out this picture of the people with the more satisfaction, that your Majesty, notwithstanding misrepresentations, may give us credit for being a majority, equally warm in the true service of our country and of your Majesty, and equally out of the reach of that baleful influence, which some way or other has hitherto succeeded, we hear, in concealing from your Majesty the wishes of an affectionate but afflicted people.

We therefore humbly presume to solicit your Majesty to exert that constitutional authority, which the laws have vested in you for the benefit of your subjects, by dissolving the present parliament, and most earnestly implore you to remove for ever from your counsels those ministers, who, not content with having violated the freedom of election without doors, have advised your Majesty to dismiss from your service the first officer of the law for his faithful endeavours to support the liberty and constitution of his country; and this measure is still the more afflicting, as our last hopes amongst your Majesty's servants were placed in his acknowledged integrity and ability, from whence we flattered ourselves the truth might reach your Majesty's ear in spite of every confederacy against it.

The grateful acclamations of your whole people (a term your ministers affect to hold in contempt) would incessantly await your Majesty if you would deign to relieve the afflictions of millions of your subjects by the dismissal of these pernicious counsellors.

For while the affairs of this great nation are, by an overruling fatality, placed in the incapable and mercenary hands of men, who, under the specious title of ministers, are collusively transferring from one to the other the inclusive right of sporting with their country, we have every calamity to dread both at home and abroad, as well from their want of experience as from their want of integrity.
